SUMMARY OF EVENTS OF THE PAST WEEK

CANADIAN

The price of wheat at the beginning of last week was $1.87 5/8. The barracks in Winnipeg occupied by Lord Strathcona House was burned and about 20 to 25 horses burned to death.

The Doukhobors in the Grank Forks district of British Columbia continue to give trouble in the schools, demanding that they shall dictate the subjects of study and singing their own songs in school. Premier Oliver has ordered that these people some time ago that if they do not respect the law, they would be taken in hand and dealt with, but they do not seem to have made up their minds to obey the law. The Doukhobors have received Premier Macdonald's letter, in answer to Mr. McPherson, said that it was not his duty to deal with the Doukhobors, but that they would be dealt with this session. Lack of time was given as the reason of his answer, but lack of inclination to tackle a rather difficult task is more probably the real one.

General Byrnes is dead. He served in the Penian Ridge, in the Riel Rebellion, with the Austrian army in Bosnia, in 1878, in the Riel Rebellion, in 1890, and as an administrator in the Great War. His branch of the service was the medical corps. Serious fire broke out last evening in the Silver Mountain and White-Hill areas of Ontario, in the Parish of St. John, and in the County of Northumberland. The fire broke out in the Silver Mountain House district of Alberta, and considerable damage has been done to timber and property. The Fraser River has been in high flood forcing some families to abandon their homes to escape the water.

Under the new law in Ontario based on 44 alcohol strength has been put on sale to the public, but there has not seem to have been any very great rush to buy it. Good rains fell at the end of last week over most of the Province south of Edmonton and east as far as the Saskatchewan border, and these will help the growing crops immensely. The Hon. J. B. Murray, Solicitor General in the Dominion Cabinet, has resigned owing to the fact that the law firm owed debts to the Home Bank which have not been paid. As the Government is not in a position to compensate those who have lost by the Bank's failure, it was thought that Mr. Murray should have been advised to resign his seat in the Cabinet. The purchase of the United Bank of Canada by the Royal Bank has been approved by Mr. Robt. Asst. Minister of Finance. This purchase was due to losses sustained by the United Bank. This Bank has many branches in the West.

The G.P.R. has announced that they cannot reduce the fares for immigrant passengers on the Atlantic till the numbers go up considerably. Passenger fares of all classes are being raised on the third class rates, so that until the immigrant rates fall, there is not likely to be much fall in the fares of the cabin classes.

The missions of Nova Scotia are still on strike after their last meeting. Before the Alberta coal commission, William Stevenson, manager of the Hildreth mine, was asked to state that certain notorious agitators had been blacklisted and refused employment in the mines of the Company.

BRITISH AND IMPERIAL. It was announced by the Australian Government that Sir John Bickel is to be sent to London as Governor-General of Australia. Lord Herbert Plumer, one of the most prominent and successful of the British generals in the Great War, is to succeed Sir Herbert Plumer as Governor-General of Australia. Lord Plumer was Governor of Malta for a time after the war and introduced the new Maltese constitution. In the Boer war he was the reliever of Mafeking.

Mr. French, Earl of Ypres, who commanded the British army at the outset of the Great War, is dead after a very severe operation. He was 73 years old. The Prince of Wales has been receiving a great welcome from the native races in South Africa. In speaking to them he warned them against paying undue attention to agitators and pointed out that only in the harmony of white and colored races could safety for South Africa lie.

There appears to be some mystery behind the resignation of Lord Allenby from the British High Commissioner in Egypt, and this is causing serious talk in political circles in Great Britain. The British Government is setting up a committee to deal with Empire problems along the lines of the Committee of Imperial Defence, and the affairs of the Dominions are to be dealt with separately from those of the Colonies. There has been a discussion of this for a little time past, as it had been suggested that the "Colonial Office" was not the best term to apply to the Department dealing with the self-governing Dominions overseas.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, late Prime Minister of Britain, is expected to visit Canada in October next. He is to be introduced to the most widely travelled man to hold the office of Prime Minister of Great Britain.

EMPIRE DAY SERVICE AT ST. LUKE'S CHURCH

Empire Day was celebrated at St. Luke's Church by a special morning service, which was attended by the Sons of England, Boy Scouts, Cubs, Girl Guides, and Brownies. The Sons of England, led by their President, Mr. Wright Beaumont, with Chief Streetfield acted as standard-bearer, and the Scouts and Guides, led by their respective leaders, followed. The service was conducted by the Rev. Mr. Wright Beaumont, who read the opening prayer. The hymns were "The Lord's Prayer" and "The Lord's Prayer". The service was a most successful one, and the children were very well behaved.

The order of service, a printed copy of which was given to each worshiper, was adapted to the spirit of Empire Day. The hymns were "The Lord's Prayer" and "The Lord's Prayer". The service was a most successful one, and the children were very well behaved.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. G. McDonald, M.A., who, after a few words of cordial welcome to the organizations represented, preached from the words of St. Paul, "The foundation that no man can lay other than that which is Jesus Christ." The preacher urged that we should have our personal lives and our national lives based on the life of Jesus Christ and a practice in accordance with that faith.

The small states of the world are now being called upon to change hands. Miss Alice Jones arrived in Dovercourt on Tuesday. She left for Ricer on Wednesday, where she is to be married.

Fires are burning fiercely on every side of Dovercourt. All of the abode of Mrs. Richards have been fighting the fire in that district.

Rain has been needed to help the crops. On Thursday which will help a lot. Eighty percent of the seeding is finished and some wheat is up three inches.

Other nations. If Germany fails to close her borders to the world, there may be some difficulty about her paying her obligations under the Dawes agreement.

CRICKET

On Monday the Red Deer cricket team went to Olds to play a friendly game with the Olds club. The match was arranged at very short notice and the result was a very weak one, several of the best players not being available. Only nine men were able to go, but Olds were not at full strength either, and one man from Olds was lent to the Red Deer team, both sides playing ten men.

Olds took first innings, but found Lavender in fine form with the ball, and no pronounced stand was made. The pitch was not to be treacherous, the ball shooting at one time and getting up dangerously at others. Ives, who started the bowling with the ball, took a few overs to find his length, but thereafter bowled well.

When Red Deer went in to bat, the first two wickets fell cheaply, but the third was made by the third wicket. Ives, who batted very well, was the only one who batted well, and he was the only one who batted well.

The Mutual Life Pays its Claims Promptly

DELAYS in the settlement of life insurance claims add financial worry to the distress of the bereaved family. The Mutual Life of Canada has always made a special feature of prompt payment of claims, being the first company to waive the 30 to 40 days time limit for settlement, which was the custom in pioneer days.

It is not the desire of the Mutual Life to take advantage of technicalities to postpone or contest settlement of claims. The purpose of this company is to be a refuge and a comfort in time of family trouble and stress. The widowed and the fatherless receive the full benefits provided for them by Mutual policies at the earliest possible moment, and with the least possible worry.

HISTORY'S MOST FAMOUS WATERWAY

The Struggle for the Dardanelles

Almost exactly ten years ago began the strenuous struggle for the possession of the Gallipoli Peninsula, in which for nearly a year the flower of Britain's manhood was brutally slaughtered in a desperate struggle for a hold on that inhospitable shore.

The campaign was undertaken because control of the hilly peninsula was vital to the opening of the historic Hellespont to the Allies' shipping; and a passage through these narrow straits was of such supreme importance to the powerful ally from whom such great deeds were expected, that from whom, alas, little but bitter disappointment ever accrued that Britain could not venture to make the attempt. In addition to the insistent clamour of Russia for a passage to the Black Sea, in order that she might receive an uninterrupted supply of munitions of war—the lack of which was so appalling evidence of her staff when von Hindenburg crushed her great army among the marshes of Tannenberg in the fall of 1914, the war were several other considerations which prompted the Allied Council to attempt to force a passage through the straits: the costly but abortive battle of Neuve Chapelle in March, 1915, had proved conclusively that any advance on the Western front was for the time being out of the question; our line was too thin; but, our resources were too few, and our ammunition supply altogether inadequate to permit of anything but a dogged and determined defence; then again there was the supreme necessity of diverting the great Turkish army from a projected attack on that artery of the communists with the East, the Suez Canal; and finally the sound military policy of striking the enemy in his weakest spot, which at that time was undoubtedly his left flank. And when one pondered for a moment on the glorious reward offered for success in forcing the Dardanelles (the Hellespont of the ancient Greeks)—the holding together of Russia, the moral and active support of all the Balkan states including Greece and Bulgaria, and the crushing blow to the prestige of the enemy—who will dare to say that the attempt was not worth while? Nay, rather, who can deny that the attempt at the Straits was at once the most brilliant in conception, the most daring in execution, and the most successful in promise of all the campaigns which we now refer to as the Great War?

A Land of Desolation
The peninsula of Gallipoli is a narrow tongue of barren land lying between the Aegean Sea and the Dardanelles, about thirty miles in length and varying in width from two to ten miles. The shore is mainly rocky and steep, but broken in places by deep ravines and gullies, down which in the wet season flow torrential streams. The interior is rugged and barren, the soil being so unfruitful that a few stunted olives, some desolate looking pines, and some thorny scrub are the only evidences of life. The extreme southern tip is called Cape Helles and is dominated by a lofty and forbidding peak called Achil Baba. It was here that the first Turkish batteries were installed by a lofty and forbidding peak called Achil Baba. It was here that the first Turkish batteries were installed by a lofty and forbidding peak called Achil Baba. It was here that the first Turkish batteries were installed by a lofty and forbidding peak called Achil Baba.

Preparations for the Landing
Before operations could be begun it was necessary to secure some harbour as close as possible to the Straits to serve as an advanced base where large stores of necessities, such as food and ammunition, could be stored for future use. The port of Mudros in the island of Lemnos was selected as this base, for though the island itself offered nothing in the way of supplies, being unable even to furnish water, and though it was only a few miles from Gallipoli, yet it furnished a tolerably safe anchorage for ships as well as a training ground for soldiers. At the outset it was decided to attempt a passage of the Straits by night, and to land the troops in the light of mine fields across the entrance and when mine-sweepers had completed to destroy these, the way to the beach was clear. The mine-sweepers were despatched floating mines down the stream which flows towards the Mediterranean, and these quickly sank three large battleships, one French and two British. It was then decided to land a force of 15,000 men, the naval attack, and General Sir Ian Hamilton was appointed Commander in-Chief. The enemy were apprised of this by spies who, standing in the Aegean and began with feverish haste to fortify every possible landing place so that by the time the invading force was ready the German engineers in charge of the defence had rendered the peninsula not only almost impregnable but also well-nigh unapproachable.

On the morning of April 24th, which was the first day of the campaign, the Mediterranean was sufficiently calm for small boats to arrive in the straits. The transports steamed slowly on to Mudros Harbour, and at midnight the soldiers were transferred to the smaller war-boats and motor-torpedoes which were to take them towards the shore. Dawn would be at five o'clock, and the landing which had been planned to take place simultaneously at several different spots were arranged for five-thirty. Shortly before four the whole fleet of French and British battleships began an intense bombardment of the Turkish position, while picket-boats and lighters crept shorewards with crowded loads of men heavily laden with packs, rifles, provisions and engineering tools; in fact everything which promised towards the preservation of life in the country of the enemy.

The Landing at Cape Helles
The 33rd Division, consisting of British regulars who had been called to Mudros from garrison duty in the far-dung corners of the Empire, were the main attacking force at Helles, and their leading battalions had approached within a quarter of a mile of the beach before the Turks gave the slightest indication of their presence. Then, suddenly, every rifle and machine-gun on the cliffs began a tremendous fire upon the boats. There was no question of their missing. They had their target right in front of them on both flanks at ranges of 1,000 to 1,500 yards. The boats were hit in broad daylight, boats hunched together and crammed with helpless men. Those who were not killed in the boats at the first discharge jumped overboard to evade or swim ashore; many of these were killed by the shore batteries, or away by the current, or drowned by the weight of their equipment, or engaged in the water by the machine-gun fire and riddled with bullets as they struggled to free themselves. A few reached the shore, scooped up a little head-cover and then began rapid fire with their Lee-Enfield rifles to support their comrades following behind.

Under the most intense and concentrated volume of rifle and machine-gun fire that man had ever been called upon to face the gallant 29th continued their struggle for a hold on the shore. In the darkness the one-sided combat continued, varied only by an increasing bombardment from the Turkish batteries. The cover of the stone buildings in a village on the cliff-top, while the nerve-strain was augmented by the shriek and the scorching sun. As the welcome darkness came on others joined the 29th on the beach and the few officers left alive rallied their men for a forward rush. But before this the Turkish machine-guns had been brought into the darkness, rushing right down to the water's edge. There came a terrible and confused fighting, the desperate battle went on and with the first streaks of dawn the few survivors of the 29th were seen in some miraculous manner escaped death or wounds fought their way to the water's edge. A hurried conference was held in the darkness, and those who decided that to retreat was not only unthinkable but impossible, and then let them make the few possible inevitable destruction. So, with every gun in the fleet again bombarding the enemy position they went forward from the beach to the water's edge. Though many of them had been fighting continuously for twenty-four hours, though none of them had had a moment's respite from the terrible hail of bullets and shrapnel, though not one of them had a drink of water other than that which he carried from the ship, and though all of them were exhausted, they drove the Turks from their front trenches at the point of bayonet, and made good the landing place for following battalions whose presence was so desperately needed on shore.

ANZAC
Meanwhile another attack had developed a few miles farther north, the object of which was two-fold—to prevent the Turks from concentrating their forces against one point of attack and eventually to link up with the 29th Division. The plan was a continuous line from which the ridge overlooking the Straits might be reached. Then, when the attack was made, the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps—the initials of which were afterwards combined to form the ANZAC—were to land at that tiny point of rock and hill which was for months afterwards eyed deep with a rich blood of the Allies. The site of the landing was a rocky promontory called Gaba Tepe with narrow strips of beach, and an exceedingly steep and broken cliff. Inland the ground rose in steep hills and spurs with occasional clumps of pine upon them, and everywhere was a dense undergrowth of thorny scrub. As at Helles the enemy was well prepared, but several battalions of men reached the shore before daylight broke, and charging forward with the bayonet drove the Turks into the scrub. On went the gallant boys from the land of the Southern Cross though not one of them knew that cracked and fissured jungle. They broke through it on to machine guns, or showed up on a mound and were blown to pieces, or stumbled into some hidden snare or trench to be bayoneted. They fell. Yet forward they went shouting as they ran "Australia will be there." With the coming of daylight every Turkish gun and rifle opened on the transports and lighters in the bay below, but still the men waded to the beach and rushed up the hill in support. By ten o'clock the Turks had assembled over twenty thousand defenders to face less than one quarter of that number who had succeeded in reaching the cliff, and for four hours they attacked with a fury and tenacity peculiar to the Turk fighting for his life. Their commander knew that success to the invaders would bring the end of the peninsula within a day to cut off all his army at Helles and he threw every available fighter into a desperate endeavor to drive our men into the sea.

They came fresh from superior positions with many guns to break our line, shrieking as they advanced, the proclamation of their faith. The Australians burst them back into the sea.

burning scrub again and again. With attack and counter-attack the battle continued all day, and when darkness fell the burning bush was a lurid glare. But there was no rest or lull; men fired and dug in until they fell asleep from sheer exhaustion; more Turkish charges and they woke and fired and again dug in. It was cruelly cold after the sun had gone, but there was no chance of warmth or food; to dig in, to beat back the Turks, or to die was all that men could think of. In the darkness they scrambled up the pathless cliffs with tin of water or boxes of cartridges, and carried back the wounded and dying to the beaches, which were crowded with countless heroes who with their last breath cheered on the newcomers who were still landing or yelled defiance at the shrieking of the great Turkish shells which had broken their bodies but could not subvert their spirits.

At all through the night the infuriated enemy attacked, but never a yard could he recover from those weary ones in the scrub, exhausted as they were with twenty-four hours of incessant fighting and facing every few hours fresh relays of Turkish heavy reinforcements kept pouring in. With steadily increasing intensity the battle developed all next morning, and shortly before noon the attack reached its height. As they dashed forward in mass formation with a few cries of fury and hate, the guns of our warships suddenly opened out and swept them from flank to flank until they fell in hundreds. Our men saw the enemy slacken and halt, and then with a cheer they charged him and beat him home, seized new ground from him and dug themselves in in front of him. All through the day there was desultory fighting up and down the line, but no further great concerted attack by the enemy. The Turks had suffered more than he could stand, and by nightfall of the second day the Australians and New Zealanders had won and fortified their position.

A Footing Gained
The early fighting which ended from dawn on the 25th April till noon on the third day following was on a footing, not more than that, on the peninsula; it settled the German line that we should never be able to land. We had landed upon, had taken and held the whole of the narrow western strip of coast, in the face of an army more than three times our strength, and the trenches had been supplied. We had lost heavily in the attack, and our men were weary from the exceedingly arduous duties of the landing. But now we must press on before the Turks could recover. And why did we not "press on" immediately? We did not because it was not humanly possible; because in modern war three men armed with machine guns, and strongly entrenched in a country familiar to them, will always stop one weary man with a rifle advancing in the open over unknown country. Our men had done the unimaginable in getting ashore at all; they could not do the impossible at the same time. Those engaged in the first landing were clambering and fighting in great heat without proper food, and in many cases without water, for 24 or 36 hours, varying the fighting with hurried but deep digging in mud or clay, trying to sleep for a moment's respite from the perils of death; then going down to the beach to make plenty of quack roasts, or dig shelters, to wade out and carry or drag on shore food, drink, ammunition and guns; and to do this without appliances, only with the strength of their arms. Then when they had almost reached the limit of human endurance to carry water, food and ammunition to the trenches, not in carts but on their backs, and then to stand in the trenches and beat back the ever-attacking enemy. On the top of the misery, exhaustion, and never-ceasing peril with which such tasks are fraught, came the terrible strain of keeping awake when dead-beat. For five or six hours men were compelled to withstand this strain, and under such circumstances men could "press on," no matter how valiant their hearts may be. Men who are unjust enough to think that they could or should, should work for a hot summer's day at digging without food or drink, then work for a night carrying heavy boxes, then die for some hours longer, and at the end of that time ask the writer to fire a machine gun at them at close range while they "press on" through barbed wire entanglements.

No, it was for the Turk to go forward, to beat our tired men before supports could be landed, for he was at all times well supplied with food and ammunition. All our supplies, including even water, came from Alexandria, three hundred miles across a submarine-infested sea; but the enemy's stores came by rail and road in comparative safety right up to their trenches.

And that the Turk did not go forward, that he could not drive those few heroic souls into the sea, is the greatest tribute that can be held to those who were there. But let an enemy give them their reward: On the body of a dead Turk officer was found a letter written a few hours before to his wife. It was a tender, affectionate letter, filled mostly with personal matters, and at the end was the phrase: "These British are the finest fighters the world has." We have chosen the "wrong friends!"

ECKVILLE

The people were very glad to see the rain, although it involved the postponement of the baseball game between the Mountain House and Eckville on Thursday evening. Even the baseballers themselves did not object.

On Sunday afternoon a debate of something more than local interest took place in the Socialist Hall. The subject was a motion "That the farmers should join the Communist Party." The affirmative was taken by Messrs. J. Glanbeck, H. Kinsinger and Gust Maki, while the negative was taken by George Christie, L. M. Colpitts and H. G. Scott. Each side was allowed 55 minutes to speak, with 5 minutes additional for rebuttal. Gust Maki began and argued that the capitalist system had cultivated its usefulness and that communism was best fitted to replace it and was not, as sometimes suggested, characterized by the use of knives and bombs. Henry Kinsinger argued that farmers even in possession of quarter or half sections of land could make little profit from such land, and even though well fed and clothed were relatively speaking in very poor circumstances. He also argued that it was unfair that large corporations like the C.P.R. and the Hudson's Bay Company should be in possession for speculative purposes of large tracts of land which they held for sale at prices which could not be paid and give the purchaser a chance of making a profit on his investment. J. Glanbeck gave a number of statistics showing the heavily burdened condition of the farmers in the West, who were in danger of losing their land under the pressure of mortgages and debts and could not work themselves clear. He suggested that under communism these debts would be cancelled and the means of production and supply in the hands of the community. He expressed his approval of the wheat pool and such enterprises but contended that they did not go far enough. If the concept of communism when it was set up, attempted to destroy it, the communist government which would result in possession of the courts and the militia would know how to deal with such attempts.

For the negative George Christie began by explaining to the audience the principles of Karl Marx, the founder of communism. In this he differed from the supporters of the motion, who made little or no attempt to explain just what they meant by communism. Mr. Christie's remarks were merely preparatory to the other speakers, and he did not have time to develop his argument fully, which, indeed, was the case with Gust Maki also. L. M. Colpitts admitted that the present economic system had failed to prevent the existence of some undoubted evils, but flatly denied that communism was a remedy for such. He opposed communism for its leveling of class war and recommended instead class co-operation along the lines of the U.F.A. movement. He also objected to the communist doctrine of dictatorship of the proletariat, but because it would exclude from the government a large proportion of the population of Canada and also because the proletariat was perhaps the least efficient section of the community. H. G. Scott based his opposition to communism on the fact that it meant either anarchy or a rigid discipline accompanied by the constant dictation of a multitude of salaried officials. He further pointed out that the theory of communism was so opposed to the inherent tendencies of human nature that in practice it must make for a lowered standard of production and efficiency, and that its introduction would inevitably mean civil war, and finally that its practical application had always been a failure, especially in the most recent case of Russia. A few minutes were taken by the speakers in rebuttal, and then a vote was carried by 70 to 13.

A satisfactory feature of the meeting was the entirely quiet and courteous hearing given to all the speakers, and the general good feeling that prevailed on all sides.

SYLVAN LAKE

We take pleasure along with our other 98 correspondents in saying, "My, What a Lovely Rain!"

Appropos of the above item, we are reminded of old days on the Woodstock, Ontario, Sentinel Review. That worthy paper specializes on country correspondence. They have a wonderful list that practically includes every hamlet and inhabited locality in Ontario County. It was in the fall quite some years ago, and the then editor, named Abrahams, was editing up the copy from the hundred or so correspondents. Invariably every correspondent had reported the fact that "The farmers are busy pulling turnips." Abrahams pondered the weighty subject for some time, and then decided to count up his innumerable correspondents and allow just seven of them to retain the item in their weekly effusions. He put the numbers in and let the office boys draw out the winning numbers. The other empty correspondents never were able to understand why their little item was blue-pencilled.
